

Hello! My name is Kendall Busher. I am a fourth-year student at the University of Georgia studying horticulture with an emphasis on sustainable food production. I grew up in northwestern Minnesota but have been living in Georgia for five years now. My love of horticulture was realized during my final year of high school while volunteering at an organic CSA farm. While spending time on this farm, I fell in love with working in the soil every day to nurture and cultivate beautiful and delicious organic produce. After these experiences, it was a natural choice to choose UGA's horticulture program. While vegetables have always been my focus, my knowledge and passion regarding other aspects of horticulture, like ornamentals and natives, has grown immensely during my time at UGA. Now, as my undergraduate degree comes to a close, I am planning to continue my education at UGA by pursuing a Master's degree in horticulture studying broccoli production in Georgia.
